

With both cable services and telephone companies expanding their coverage with broadband access, why do we need a third competitor. If the interference from BPL is even half of what it is expected to be, the FCC will be tied up for years with interference complaints. I think the power companies should stay with what they do best, and they strive to improve so we don't have repeats of the recent situations in the northeast and California a few years back.